BUFFALO GIRLS, by Larry McMurtry (Simon & Schuster: $19.95).

Had E.Z.C. Judson and Larry McMurtry been contemporaries, they probably would have been literary rivals. It was Judson, writing the popular 19th century dime novels under the pseudonym Ned Buntline, who glamorized the Wild West and virtually alone converted an unknown buffalo hunter and scout into the world-celebrated Buffalo Bill Cody.

McMurtry, on the other hand, recognizes that the Old West was transformed into an heroic experience by the likes of Buntline capitalizing on the illusions of those back East. McMurtry, author of the highly popular novel "Lonesome Dove" and its television adaptation, reveals in his books the deception that even today persists about the short-lived history of the West.

"Buffalo Girls," for instance, focuses on the celebrated heroine, Calamity Jane. Martha Jane Canary, in reality, was a homely, foul-mouthed, drunken mule skinner and drifter who preferred men's garb possibly to detract from her own lack of femininity. McMurtry depicts Calamity and her irresponsible, scruffy companions in their last chance at living out their conceptions of the glory days of the West as members of the dramatic yet unreal atmosphere of Bill Cody's touring Wild West Show. The story is fascinating yet depressing in its recreation of a past that never was. Buntline, not to mention John Wayne, must have turned over in his grave.

Antiques and Collecting

CARVED CHINESE FURNITURE

Chinese furniture was originally made to be arranged along walls of a room, and it was rarely placed at right angles to a wall. A unit could be made with a chair on each side was often used, and the units were combined if more seats were needed. A table, which held either food or artwork, was always placed next to each chair. The furniture forms were similar to those used in Europe, but there were differences in their design and proportion.

Chinese furniture was exported to America and Europe in the last part of the 19th century. Styles were patterned after popular European Victorian pieces, and those with elaborate carvings were the most popular. Chinese chairs rarely had arms, and those with arms were used by men. The exported chairs that had arms were large, heavy and had low, deep wooden seats.

The dining tables were square or round and not very large. Chinese diners had to be able to serve themselves from many dishes placed in the center of the table. Similar furniture was made in India and Burma. The ornate furniture remained popular until the early 1900s when it went out of style. There has been new collector interest since the 1980s. Carved pieces are again being made in China for sale in America and Europe.

Q. I have an old tin windup toy A 6½-inch-high tower that looks like an airport building holds a two-foot-long rod at the top. At one end of the rod is an open airplane with a pilot, and at the other end is a dirigible. Turn the key in the airplane and the two airships fly in descending circles until they make a perfect landing. Do you know when it was made? Why the dirigible?

A. Toy makers often include fantasy in their products. The "Sky Bird Flyer" was a 1929 toy. Several companies made similar toys. Marx had a "Dare Devil Flyer" and the plane on that toy did loops while flying. The airship made news from the first transatlantic flight in 1924 to 1937 when the Hindenberg exploded. Toys reflect fantasy and history. To learn more about American toys, read "The Story of American Toys" by Richard O'Brien (Abbeville, $49.95).
